Research interests: What promotes the emergence of cooperation and collective behavior in mammalian societies and to what extent do individuals make consistent social decisions across contexts? To understand the rules governing social decision-making, my lab integrates perspectives from evolutionary biology, ecology, animal behavior, physiology, and conservation biology. We test modern ecological theory using long-term data on free-living mammals to uncover the causes and consequences of individual variation in a changing world. We combine ecological monitoring in the field, tools from endocrinology and molecular genetics in the lab, and modern computational and comparative approaches to explain decision-making and collective social behavior. We focus primarily on rich data sets for which extensive behavioral, demographic, genetic, and endocrine measures are available for recognizable individuals across multiple generations. We also implement novel technological tools, social network theory, and the comparative method to understand the evolution of behavior in nature.
